

Into code and back

This sentence is markup, the mode you have written all book. Type a hash and Typst reads what follows as one code expression: two plus two is 4, and SHOUTING comes back in capitals.

The trip runs the other way too. Inside a code block, square brackets open a patch of markup called a content block:

The forecast is sunny today.

The `let` line is code; the bracketed line is markup again, with the code value spliced back in by one more hash. Markup, code, markup — you can cross the border as often as you like.