

Two kinds of block

A content block `[ . . . ]` produces content — markup you can name, store, and drop into the page later:

Remember to save first.

A code block `{ . . . }` runs a little sequence of statements and evaluates to their joined result. Reach for it when you need to compute before you show:

The rectangle is 8 by 5, so its area is 40.

The two content lines inside the braces are joined into one piece of content, which the block hands back to the page.